The accused were charged with having scizedthe Niurochiti a Tabitian schooner, at the end of 1891, when at the island of Kankura, in the Paumotos, and with having murderd the captain and five of the crew. The life of the cook, man named Hippolyte Mirey (a friend of the Roriques), was spared, and on arriving at Ponape, Caroline Islands, he gave information of the tragedy. The brothers Rorique were found guilty and were sentenced to death. The men under sentence of death were at one time on board a schooner that left Sydney for the islands. The master of that vessel had an anxious time of it. During his trip all but these two men fell sick, some so seriously that their lives were despaired of. The sickness was attributed to eating canned meat, the belie. being that the meat was poisoned by the chemicals used in the soldering process. They also pensions for the support of agod and helpless tariff duties provided for in the proposed legislawere part of a crew on an island trip when people. the ship's rigging was by some means malicionsly out away, and on that occasion the master of the vessel so disliked their general demeanour that he refused to take them with him after he reached the island he was then bound for. The two men are therefore well known amongst certain of the island traders here. It was an island steamer that first brought the news to Sydney of the outrage baving been committed for the perpetration of which the two prisoners have now been sentenced to death. and the news was received here with much operatiother would remodel their tariff themsurprise, as they are both agreeably-mannered seives V. One of the brothers was successful in retting charge of a station on one of the islands near Tahiti, and the other was given the position of mute for a trading voyage on board the Niurochiti. This vessel belonged to a Tahitian Prince and was fitted out in good style. She carried a supercarge in the person of a Mr. Gibson, who has relatives and friends in Sydney, and who was brutally murdered with the other vic ims, the whole of the bodies being thrown overboard. The full particulars of this remarkable South Sea horror were published at the time. The cook of the vessel was spared by the murderers; all the rest, including the captain, the supercarge, the second mate, and the sailors, were shot and pitched into the sea.
